As you know, I just graduated from Cornell Law School, and I have secured myself a spot as a Summer Associate in the Emilia Romagna office of one of my favorite giants of Italian law, Feliciola Finanzè, an international insolvency law firm. As a first-year lawyer, I will begin with two key projects: - I will contribute to the work of the Finance Division, mostly related to insolvency proceedings. I will be involved in two other departments, specifically: 1) the Administration of Justice, in which I will work mainly on the ANMA project, a new law that will complement and update the bankruptcy law, and 2) the Tax, Insurance, and Business law and companies, specifically with respect to auction sales. I have found that using these "add-ons" can be a bit of a time-sink as well. I'm a big fan of using integration engines to link together my integrations, but when it comes to selecting them, the choice is often very biased towards the most popular ones. In regards to coding, I tend to use PHP and Java, but I am really open to any and all languages. My preference is to use Python and R, but I just feel like I'm a little too set in my ways to ever really change what I code in. This is just one example of some of the work I do. I find the amount of time it takes to set up integrations to be the biggest barrier for almost all of my work (including freelance projects, how-to-manuals, and even simple website maintenance). I find that my integrations are often useful, but very difficult to set up. So, what are your favorite integration platforms, and how do you find the various integrations? Do you set up your own integrations, or do you use a platform to do that for you?Hepatic and biliary parameters in patients with benign parenchymal liver disease and in patients with hepatocellular carcinoma. The main objective of this study was to compare the different hepatic and biliary parameters in patients
